CARL HANSMAN SHOT WHEN MISTAKEN FOR DEER BY COMPANION

Carl M. Hansman was injured fatally Saturday afternoon while hunting on Robertson Hill. Shortly after separating from his companions, Charles Chapin, 26, and Sidney Howe, 17, it is said that he was mistaken for a deer by Howe and was shot, the bullet striking him back of the left shoulder and coming out near the right shoulder. He died a few minutes later.

Mr. Hansman was born in New York City Aug. 30, 1914, the son of Carl A. and Bessie Cushman Hansman. He was a graduate of Gould Academy, in the class of 1933 and Cornell University in 1937. Since then he has studied law in New York and in the office of Herrick & Park in Bethel. He has lived with his aunt, Mrs. Abbie H. C. Finck, at their home in Mayville.

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF CARL M. HANSMAN

Our community suffers a deep loss at the untimely death of Carl M. Hansman. A cloud of sadness that will be slow in lifting is settled among his neighbors and many friends.

With a genial smile and an able mind he was well-loved and respected.

As a boy his school-mates and teachers recognized his aptitude and charm. As a youth his colleagues and instructors in college acknowledged his integrity and high character. His was ever the highest scholastic attainment. As an earnest young man and student in the law offices of Hon. Ellery C. Park he won admiration.

Interested in mountain climbing and other out-door sports he keenly appreciated the beauties of the woods, the hills and the waters in this rugged region.

His amateur photography was of a professional perfection.

Surrounded by these sentinel hills he loved so well, he reposes for the eternal sleep in the peaceful beauty of Riverside Cemetery.

DAVID KIRK RECEIVES FATAL WOUND NEAR HOME MONDAY P. M.

David Kirk died Monday evening from wounds received when his gun discharged as he watched for deer from a tree on the slope of Waterspout Mountain near his home on Chandler Hill.

The wounded boy was discovered at the foot of the tree by his father, Robert Kirk, who went at once to the boy's favorite hunting location when he did not return or answer calls after dark. Summoning help, the boy was carried home on an improvised stretcher by Mr. Kirk and Dr. Wilson, where he passed away about 8 o'clock.

The gun was found, caught in the tree several feet from the ground, with one barrel discharged. Buckshot passed through his right hand and through his head.

David Kirk was born in Bethel July 6, 1923, the son of Robert and Mabel Bean Kirk. He was a member of the Boy Scouts and of the Senior Class of Gould Academy.

He is survived by his parents, two brothers, Robert and Richard of Bethel, and a sister, Mrs. Lawrence Holt of Miami, Fla.

40 YEARS AGO in the NEWS

Nov. 20, 1899

Mr. Lary, a brakeman on the G. T. R., lost two fingers while coupling cars at the station last Friday.

Last week Eben S. Kilborn and Judge A. E. Herriek acquired title to more than 3,000 acres of timated in Albany. This property was a part of the estate of the late A.

"THEY TELL ME"

Well, the way it turned out the President did better than he planned probably when he tried to have an early Thanksgiving—everybody it seems will have one Thanksgiving anyway—and some will have two. And why shouldn't we have two of them? With so many folks living in countries torn by wars and suffering under forms of government that are terrible beyond our understanding, we can well stop to give thanks for the "American" way. In spite of all its imperfec-tions, where else is the enjoyment of life and liberty—and the pursuit of happiness—so taken for granted as in the United States? Where else can the people speak their mind and seek to improve their lot as they do here? Let's give thanks that this country, as planned 150 years ago, is still in good running

The SNAPSHOT GUILD THANKSGIVING PICTURES

Make the Thanksgiving record complete this year. It's easy, with high-speed film and amateur flood bulbs—even if you have an inexpensive camera.

SPECIAL events—days of special activity—always offer snapshot material. And Thanksgiving, not so far off now, is one of the best of these days, from the standpoint of the camera fan.

Thanksgiving picture taking should start before the day itself, if you want a complete record. A shot of the turkey—being purchased or being brought home—starts off the series nicely. Arrival of visiting relatives means more pictures. Preparations the day before Thanksgiving—such as the baking of pies or the icing of cakes —these are also possibilities for the camera.

Don't overlook human-interest shots as the dinner is being prepared—such as Johnny peering hopefully into the kitchen, or the turkey emerging from the oven, brown and steaming. Get a shot or two as the table is being set, and the holiday delicacies brought in.

A picture of Grandfather or Uncle John carving is practically a "must" on your Thanksgiving Day list. A

JACKSON-SILVER UNIT No. 68

Eight members attended the Second District Council meeting in Lewiston Saturday afternoon. They were President Annie Kimball, Edith Littlefield, Florence Swift, Idella Morgan, Ina Smith, Evelyn Barrett, Flora Cummings and Fannie Cummings.

President Mary Dumas of Lisbon Falls presided at the very interesting meeting to which the Fourth District was invited and many wonderful Unit activity reports were given by the Presidents in both districts. The Third District was also represented.

National Chaplain, Marietta Greenlaw of Augusta and National Committee Woman Olive Tinkham were among the interesting speakers. Several State and District officers also attended.

It was voted to send $5.00 each to the State Rehabilitation and Child Welfare Departments. Funds for these programs are much needed at this time of the year. Maine has been outstanding in this work, having spent $31,000 on Child Welfare alone last year.

Membership is much ahead of what it was at this time last year, reports Department Secretary Anne E. Lovely.

The mystery package was won by Mabel O'Brien of Bethel.

The Lewiston Auxiliary served refreshments following the meeting.

The Unit sponsored a "benefit" card party at Legion Home Saturday evening, which was well attended.

Comrade Joe Barrett, who has been in Togus Hospital following an operation for appendicitis, hopes to be home for Thanksgiving.
Comrade and Mrs. Levi Smith and Mrs. Evelyn Barrett visited him
Sunday.

Comrade Roy Morgan was one of the lucky hunters this season.

Regular meetings of the Post and Unit are Friday evening, Dec. 1.
Members attend and help plan the Christmas program.

which will be served Dec. 5.

Toys for the rehabilitation program are to be left at Olive Lur-vey's, who is Unit chairman.

object of hunting is sport—it is not a serious matter if you don't get a deer or any game, but it is a serious matter if you kill your best

"So here you are, eh? I never expected to see you again."
"Again?" cried Jennie, "you've seen him?"
"Have I seen him? Didn't he give me the slip in Munich?"
"You've met Mr. Pierpont before? Isn't that funny?"
"Pierpont?—That's Dr. Jebb."
"Dr. Jebb?—why?"—she turned to Jebb.

"That's the name," said Jebb. "And I got your ring away from him, Jennie. See, here it is." And he fished it out. "He wouldn't tell me how he came by it, though."
"Wasn't that delicate of him?" And she beamed on Jebb till she frightened him.
"Delicate!" gasped Charlie. "Delicate! Then you really did give it to him? Then it is true that you—"

"Sit down, you old dear, and I'll tell you." She toppled the mountain on to the waiting divan.
"It's an old story to you, Mr. Pierpont," she said, "but you won't mind hearing it again. Well, to begin at the beginning, you see, Charlie, you wrote me that you were going into the mountains for a month or so of hunting. Just after you disappeared, Charlie, I had a call for five thousand dollars more margin on my stock in the—oh, that awful investment you let me in for."

"Rock Island, you mean."
"That's it. You told me to hold for a rise."

"Well, I see by the paper that it's up twenty-nine points."
"Yes, but at that time somebody attacked it and the bottom fell out for a few days. I had word one afternoon from my brokers in Munich that if I didn't cover the drop by morning I'd be wiped out."

"Is that so? Somebody was hammering her, I suppose."

"Well, whoever hammered it, it hit the toboggan and I stood to lose all I had put up. That very evening the cablegrams announced that my bank in New York had been looted by its president, and had closed its doors. I found where the cashier of my Munich bank lived and telephoned his house. He said that my letter of credit was good for nothing unless the bank opened again. I was simply in despair. I went to three hotels in Munich to look up friends of ours, and not one could I find. In the last hotel I just sat down in the lobby and had a good cry."

"At that moment who should come along but Mr. Pierpont here. I didn't know him and he didn't know me, but he heard me crying, and said, 'Pardon me, madame, is there anything I can do for you?' It sounded so good to hear an American voice and he spoke so gently and I was so weak that I just up and told him the story."

"Well, what do you suppose this angel of a Mr. Pierpont did? I can hear him now—'There, there, my poor child'—" she laughed moistly. "he called me his poor child when I'm old enough to be his mother!"

But Charlie was impatient:

"Go on. What did he say?"

"He said, 'There, there, my poor child; if you'll stop crying, I'll give you the money.' I said, 'You'll lend me—twenty thousand marks—me!—a total stranger!' 'Certainly,' he said, 'you are an American,' and I said, 'But I have no security,' and he said, 'You're an American'—as if that proved anything!"

"He wouldn't listen to any argument or scruples, he just asked me to excuse him while he went to his room and got at his money belt, and when he came back he handed me the sum to be—oh, I don't know. Then he—"

"You must have something to get along on till you hear from your brother or till your bank reopens,"

"But I compromised on five hundred."

and he actually wanted to give me a thousand dollars more. But I compromised on five hundred. The next morning I had the money at the brokers' bright and early and I made a solemn resolve that I'd never speculate on margins again."

"Did you keep the vow?" grinned Charlie. She pouted meekly:

"Well, I might have kept it if the stock hadn't gone skyrocketing up again. It never rains but it pours, you know, and in two days that awful bank was reorganized and reopened, and my letter of credit was all right. But when I came to look for Mr. Pierpont he had paid his bill and disappeared, taking his little niece along with him."

"But the ring—the ring," said brother Charlie, voicing a curiosity that was aching in Jebb's breast, "how did you come to give him the ring I gave you?"

"Such a silly question, Charlie. Can't you see I felt so ashamed of taking his money with no security, that I forced it on him. He didn't want to take it, but I made him. When he learned it was worth only about half what he lent me he consented."

Charlie rounded on Jebb:

"Well, why in thunder didn't you tell me all this on the train when I accused you of stealing the ring?"

"That was his delicacy. Can't you see, Charlie? He didn't want to involve me."

Charlie could understand that he owed Jebb a handsome apology, and he put it in his own terms.

"I guess the drinks are on me, old man. I've made a jackass of myself, and I admit it. What'll it be?"

But Jebb declined to liquidate the account.

And then sister Jennie said she must run up to her room and write him a check for twenty-two thousand marks, and Jebb tried again to be V. Pierpont.

"There's no hurry," he said, but this was rather a failure.

"Of course there's a hurry—I've had it far too long," said Jennie, and he thought her adorable. Just in time he remembered to say:

"Would you mind making the check payable to David Jebb?"

"David Jebb?"

"That's the name you gave me on the train," her brother put in.

"That's my real name," said Jebb.

Now Charlie was off again: "But why did you call yourself Pierpont to my sister?"

"Hush, Charlie, don't make another exhibition of yourself. He was traveling incog. Very rich people often do that."

Brother Charlie and Jebb were such mutually comforting companions that when they were left together Ludlam grew restive:

"Come on into the cafe and have something."

"No, thanks."

"Well, will you excuse me if I do? I've just got in from Munich and I'm awfully thirsty."

"Don't let me keep you."

Left alone, Jebb was overcome by this new turn of the wheel. The money meant so much to him just now—it meant power, salvation from—

Then the luxury of being a minor Croesus faded before a keen anxiety for Miruma. He must find her. She must be told the news, the news that solved everything. He would go to the desk and send her his card, imploring her to grant him a hearing.

He paused—what was her name? Miruma was her first name—what was her last? Had she registered as hanim effendi? or madame hanim? or Mme. Fehmi Pasha—or what?

CHAPTER XIV

The tragic-ridiculous perplexity of Jebb solved itself. He heard a rustle and Miruma came to him as swiftly as she had vanished. He greeted her with effusion:

"Thank heaven, you came, for I was just—"

"I came to beg that you forgive me for to be so rude to you. Jebb Effendi has been so kind to me. It is to him I owe that I am free. I am very bad. I have not the right to be angry that he—"

"Deceived you. Say it!" said Jebb humbly, but she would not accept the word.

"That he did not tell me the things I have no right to know. Let us be friends once more—yes? Tell me you forgive me for to be jealous."

"Oh, don't—" he was going to say: "don't stop being jealous of me!" but he caught himself.

There was no time to explain or to let Miruma escape. Miss Ludlam was at Jebb's elbow with the check folded and palmed, as if it were a slight tip. She pretended to shake hands with him and left the money as she released the clasp:

"There you are, Mr. Pier—Dr. Jebb, and I can never thank you enough."

"Don't thank me at all—er—er—Miss Ludlam, may I present to you—may I present to you—Miss—Madame—for heaven's sake, hanim effendi, what is your name? She's my dearest friend on earth, but I don't know her name!"

"I am Madame Miruma Jaanghir. I did take my father's name."

Miss Ludlam was staring with both ears at this mysterious conversation. She was as much interested in Miruma as Miruma in her. Each was exotic to the other. Miss Ludlam sat down and motioned the other two to sit.

To explain this ring legend himself was intolerable, so Jebb rose and said:

"Won't you two talk to each other a few moments, while I go and find out about the trains to Budapest? I must take the first one."

Seeing that Miruma was afraid and deeply troubled either at this news or at being left with her supposed rival, Jebb added:

"And perhaps Miss Ludlam will tell you the story of the ring."

Then he decamped, leaving Miruma very erect and disdainful toward Miss Ludlam. When he came back the story had evidently been told, for the two women had their heads close together and were on cordial terms. He said:

"I find there is a train at 6:46—my old friend the Orient Express. It gets me to Budapest an hour before midnight. I think I'd better take it. There's just time enough for a good drive about Vienna before train time. Would you care to go?"

Miruma was willing enough to go anywhere with Jebb, and she asked only time enough to get a hat and a wrap. When she was gone, Jennie Ludlam, who could see through a millstone with a hole in it, and had guessed at once that Jebb and Miruma were infatuated, lingered to say:

"She's a perfect dear—and such a beauty! I'll take care of her for you while you are in Budapest. Your generosity to me was princely. I wish I could repay it in some way—but you are so rich. When you come back I have a scheme which might interest you—as a physician; though I dare say you don't practice any more; but perhaps you would lend me your advice. This is for charity, too."

On a sudden impulse, he made her sit down, and told her briefly the story of his curse, his other personality, the loss of the child, and his arrival in Turkey. And her sympathy came in a rush of warm thoughts implied in a pressure of his hand, a look of compassion, and a few words:

"I understand. I had a brother, a younger brother—Wentworth was his name. He—oh, I don't know about him now, and he would have been a great man if—"

It's about a memorial to him that I want to talk to you some day—oh, be glad, that you have at least half a life left in you, Dr. Jebb, and don't despair. You have helped so many in distress. You have helped me. You can, you shall help numberless others. And perhaps some day—"

He looked a "God bless you!" but he said:

"She is coming now." And he rose to meet Miruma.

Sister Jennie rose, too, and said: "You're a vision, my dear. And since Dr. Jebb is called to Budapest for a day or so, I want you to go with my brother and me to the Opera tonight."

Miruma accepted with a bashful gratitude, and Jebb and she set out for their drive.

Along the broad glory of the Ringstrasse, over the Danube by the Aspern Bridge, and down the Praterstrasse the horses galloped.

In the Prater the turmoil was gay, bewildering. The long colonnades of chestnut trees in the Haupt-Allee were choked with people. And the air was tremulous with music from the Viennese and the Magyar bands in the cafes. At the entrance was a circle where stood a naval monument on a stone column with bronze prow protruding. It reminded Jebb of the entrance to Central Park via Columbus Circle and its monument.

He longed to be there again, and above all he longed to have Miruma there with him.

"Jebb Effendi goes to Budapest this evening to find the little child. Could I not help by to go too?"

"You could—of course you could, but—but I could hardly take you with me."

"Why?"

"Don't you see?—don't you realize?—it would—it would be unfair to you; it would be compromising."

"If you do not want me—"

"Oh!" The sight of her distress unnerved him; his love was at his very lips. But he could not say anything without saying everything.

When they reached the hotel it was so late that he had no more than time to make his train, and she less than time to dress for the Opera, which begins at seven in Vienna.

So their good-by was a mere exchange of hearty promises to meet again, and a short hand-grip in the crowded hotel corridor.

Of course, that evening sister Jennie let slip an allusion to the pathetic affliction of poor Dr. Jebb, thinking Miruma knew of it; and of course Miruma extorted the whole story from her before they parted.

As she crept into her bed her heart was full of pity for her beloved, wrestling like another Jacob with a ghostly enemy, but her heart rejoiced, too, with a radiant happiness, since now her intuition told her that this, and no other cause or person, was the reason for his asperity with her.

Also in Pest there is a Hotel Bristol, and Jebb woke there the next morning. He had not been long in Budapest before he learned that the Margit-Sziget was, as Miruma had imagined, an island—in English, Margaret's Island. But, though it split the Danube, it lay so far to the north that he could not see it from his window.

He took his breakfast at one of the coffee-houses on the promenade, one of the coffee-houses that have never closed since they first opened. It gave Jebb untold relief to find English the favorite language of the town, the affection of the Magyar. He had not finished his breakfast when a man at the next table addressed him in a rather thick dialect and introduced himself as a fellow-American, though his name was unpronounceable, even when he handed Jebb his card with a legend like a line of pied type:

Gyorgy Czokless.

He asked Jebb to call him "George Czokless" for short and for easy. He explained, without being asked, that he had been swept into America on one of those tidal waves that nearly depopulated many a Hungarian village; he had become naturalized, had prospered, and returned to his country with Yankee ideas.

After some desultory conversation Mr. Czokless rose with a:

"Excuse, please, I got to go and hear de newspaper!"

"Hear the newspaper?"

"Sure. Ve got a telephone newspaper. Ain't you heard him? Come on, let's go to a telephone-like—" affair on the wall and putting the receiver to Jebb's ear watched while Jebb listened to a clear voice spelling consonants lavishly:

"You don't understand it? No? Let me listen."

He took Jebb's place and a startled expression came over him.

"Dere goes anudder bunch of dough for me Brooklyn Rapid Transit closed two points off last night in New York."

Checkless repeated more news:

"Now the newspapers say the King of England comes to Carlsbad next month. Now he names de odds on de horse-races dis afternoon."

But Jebb was not interested in Hungarian horse-races. Jebb had a curiosity to see this Margaret's Island where he and Cynthia had been together. Here George Checkless took pleasure in acting as Vergil to his Dante. They crossed a heavy Y-shaped bridge in the huge emerald set in the tarnished gold of the Danube.

He found himself in a rose garden and here as his nostrils widened over the fragrance, his arm was suddenly clutched by a peasant, evidently a gardener, who bombarded him with a shower of gutturals which he supposed to be peasant Hungarian.

"What's the matter with the old boy?" Jebb asked Checkless. "Does he think I'm going to carry off his garden?"

At length the interpreter interpreted: "He says how dare you come here."

"Isn't it a public garden?"

"Yes, but he says that you came here a month or so ago and brought a little girl vit you, and then walk off and leave her to strangers to protect."

To Checkless' amazement this heinous accusation seemed to fill Jebb with delight. He embraced the earth-smudged gardener and treated him as a long-lost prodigal.
